A Discussion about:
Nutrition-Sensitive vs. Nutrition-Specific Interventions
& Scaling Up Nutrition

Many multi-laterals and bilateral governments that contribute to global scaling up nutrition efforts use the terms nutrition-specific and nutrition-sensitive, however most do not have clear definitions.

Can organizations working in the field on nutrition programs come to a consensus? Will major donor-funded program activities improve with a clarified definition?

Join us for a discussion about what constitutes nutrition-specific and nutrition-sensitive.

What are the current working definitions and characteristics? What nutrition interventions are considered nutrition-sensitive? What are the nutrition outcomes in each of these interventions? What models look at dual approaches of nutrition-sensitive and nutrition-specific interventions? Which interventions have been costed out? What does the evidence say?

So many interesting questions are before us. We welcome anyone who is interested in scaling up nutrition and getting clarity on these terms in their own work to join us, and ask that you share this invite with others who are also working on nutrition programs.

A draft of the forthcoming Bread for the World Institute working paper to serve as background for the discussion will be sent to those who RSVP. Your comments on the draft paper are most welcome. The discussion will assist us in making final revisions, and will be added to the many contributions already received from the nutrition community.

Please join us and participate in this very important discussion!
